Market Review

In August, global bond markets were driven by shifting expectations around US monetary policy. A weaker US payrolls report early in the month altered the employment outlook, prompting a decline in US Treasury yields as markets moved to price in a September Federal Reserve rate cut. The US 10-year yield traded within a 4.18–4.40% range and ended the month at 4.2%, 14bps lower than July's close. Fed Chair Powell noted labour market softness at Jackson Hole, while political developments, including the dismissal of the Bureau of Labor Statistics head and Fed Governor Cook, coincided with a steepening of the US yield curve.

Against such a backdrop, Asian credit delivered positive returns in August, as measured by the JPM Asian Credit Index in USD, with gains supported by both duration-related returns and tighter credit spreads. Investment grade and high yield segments both advanced, with high yield outperforming on the back of more pronounced spread compression.

At the country level, all markets recorded gains, led by Thailand, Hong Kong, and Taiwan, while Vietnam and Singapore trailed the regional average. By sector, Real Estate was the strongest performer, with returns driven largely by significant spread tightening. Oil and gas, transportation, and Technology, Media, and Telecommunications (TMT) also posted solid gains, reflecting a combination of lower US Treasury yields and spread compression. In contrast, Financials lagged the broader market, with performance supported primarily by duration-related returns but with less contribution from spread tightening.

Investment Strategy

The outlook for Asian credit remains constructive, underpinned by modest but positive economic growth, relatively attractive all-in yields, and a Fed easing cycle that is expected to gather momentum. Stable credit fundamentals and moderate new bond supply have reinforced supportive technicals, while low volatility and the absence of significant negative catalysts continue to sustain a carry-driven environment.

Despite episodes of policy uncertainty and market volatility, corporate balance sheets across Asia remain broadly healthy, and banking system liquidity is ample. Importantly, there are no signs of systemic or imbalance-driven stress. These conditions provide a strong foundation for spreads to remain resilient, allowing investors to capture steady carry in a market environment defined more by macro noise than micro weakness.

Against this backdrop, the portfolio is positioned to benefit from carry while maintaining resilience. We remain overweight in duration but cautious at the long end given risks of higher term premia and a steeper US Treasury curve. Within credit, we hold an overweight to high yield, where limited supply and persistent demand have created supportive market dynamics. We are also adding exposure to off-benchmark markets such as Australia and Japan, taking advantage of the active new issue pipeline. At the same time, we continue to rotate into relative value opportunities and take selective profits in tighter names, ensuring the portfolio remains well-balanced between income generation and capital preservation.
